What advice would you give to young women who want to join the Technology and Consulting workforce?

The cool thing about technology is you almost never create the exact same thing twice. It's always improving, always shifting. It's becoming an underlying foundation for the success of every traditional discipline and business function. This diversity and range is what makes it a solid yet really interesting career...with so many possible paths.

How can we as women show our worth?

We are already worthy, of course, as individuals, colleagues, friends, family members and professionals. I like to think of it as showing our expertise. Craft and hone what you love about what you do, then share it with others. Teach and lead by example, which sometimes means taking risks. Build genuine rapport along the way.

What advice would you give your 20-year-old self?

Several things come to mind: Your mother is actually right about a few things. Also, keep following your bliss, it's a good path. Finally nothing truly worth having comes easy, but the gains are totally worth it.

In your opinion, who is the most inspirational woman in history? Why?

There have been so many inspirational women in history, like Susan B Anthony for example. But for me two super inspirational women in my life's history include my sister Sharon and my cousin Lauren. Sharon just received her PHD and is now teaching at the University of Grand Forks ND. Lauren just received her PHD in Biomedical Engineering and is about to head to medical school for her second doctorate. I think they are both going to change people's lives and perhaps even the world.
